Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: .engineer to the Birmingham Tramways Company, gave some figures which had not before been published. He stated that the charge for renewal of plates for the accumulators was only lfd. per car mile. If you take that from the cost per car mile of the accumulator system, and further deduct from it the cost per car mile of the trolley system, there remains a difference of 3 d., which goes in the handling of the cells and the increased depreciation of the cars owing to the acid fumes. Accumulators in connection with tramways have, I believe, a future, insomuch as by using batteries in the power station and in conjunction with the lighting station you may get what lighting engineers are all trying for, viz., a day load. To do this the plant would be used during the day for driving the cars and for charging batteries to tide over the short period during which full load is required during the evening, and thus economy of working would be effected. The principal portion of the cost in the working of both lighting and tramway plants is the standing charges. If you can use your plant at full load for 12 or 15 hours out of the 24, instead of two or three hours as is at present the case, you will reduce the cost for both traction and lighting to a very great extent. The author states that in most towns the cable system would be...
