We trust you will presently see the advantage of accepting this offer; but, if you should still think it better to refer the whole to an arbitration, you will find us equally disposed to that mode of settlement, and the bill for 2001. , which Mr. Coutts will keep till we receive your answer, must in that case be returned. MR. J. C. WALKER TO MR. PINKERTON. Dublin, April 28th, 1803. I was favored last night with your obliging letter, for which I beg your acceptance of my best thanks. Availing myself of your goodness, I have drawn up some notices for the gentleman who is doing me the honor to translate my Irish Bards. I do not find that such a translation was ever published; nor are there any traces in Mr. Pinkertons correspondence by whom it was projected. The alterations and emendations suggested by Mr. Walker at the close of this letter are numerous, and would be important to the possessor of his volume; but I Please to give them to him, and at the same time inform him I shall have much pleasure in attending to any commands with which he may favor me. It is right he should be told that the book was the Production of a very young man, leading a gay life, and devoting very little time to study. It was too my first attempt at composition, and it often betrays, I fear, the hand of inexperience. Such as it is, however,...
