Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Olive Percival: Los Angeles Author and Bibliophile When I go into a bookstore these days, my heart beats wildly, my cheeks burn and I hardly breathe until I am outside again, Miss Olive Percival wrote in her diary in 1896. How splendid a thing it would be to have one thousand dollars to buy books with! Ah! me! One thousand dollars remained a lordly sum to a woman whose salary as an insurance clerk in Los Angeles never exceeded $150 a month. By the time of her death in 1945, however, she had built a collection of ten thousand books. Her house was crammed with a score of other collections as well, among them hats, dolls, daguerreotypes, silver, textiles, quilts, fans, bookplates, Lalique, and Oriental art. Olive May Graves Percival was born on July 1, 1869, in a log cabin on her family s debt-ridden farm near Sheffield, Illinois. She claimed to have few pleasant memories of her childhood, which was darkened by parental discord. Her father died when she was ten, and for the...
