He served as battle captain for the battalion s assault command post. Subordinated under the 3rd Infantry Division, Melito and his unit participated in the division s initial attack into Iraq. Following destruction of Iraqi forces defending the Karbala Gap, 1-3 ADA was tasked with defense of the division s rear area and lines of communication, as well as the establishment of enemy prisoner of war collection points. Once the Iraqi capital fell and the rear area was deemed secure, his unit received a new mission to take over security of the northern, western and southern perimeters of Baghdad International Airport. At this time, too, Melito himself assumed an additional duty as the battalion s civil-military operations officer, a position he held until he redeployed back to Fort Bliss in May 2003 to assume command of an ADA company. Discussing the range of unusual missions he and his unit received and skillfully executed, Melito observed that, When there s not an air threat, you re a combat multiplier for the commander regardless. When you ve got firepower and you ve got communications and you ve got soldiers that are trained . you can use them for a lot of different things.
